Kristin Phillips is Assistant Professor in the College of Education and Adjunct Assistant Professor in the Department of Anthropology at Michigan State University (MSU). A sociocultural anthropologist, Phillips studies the politics of education and development in rural Tanzania. She joined the MSU faculty in 2009 after completing a joint Ph.D. in Anthropology and Educational Policy Studies at the University of Wisconsin-Madison and a two-year pre-doctoral fellowship at the Carter G. Woodson Institute for African-American and African Studies at the University of Virginia. Her current book project, an ethnography of rural development in the Singida region of central Tanzania, is based on research for her dissertation, which won the 2010 Gail P. Kelly Award for Outstanding Dissertation from the Comparative and International Education Society (CIES). In 2012-13 she is on leave at Emory University as a Visiting Assistant Professor in the Institute of African Studies.
